Some of the world's most luxurious resorts are on islands. Tropical beaches and sparkling waters (21) a popular getaway for so many people around the world that construction companies are running out of islands to build up. To work (22) this problem, wealthy resort developers are creating man-made islands – by digging up enough sand, builders can form an island and open up a profitable resort. (23), ecologists believe that constructing an island is very disruptive to the natural environments.

One of the most notorious man-made developments is by the government of Dubai. The project, called “The World,” is a series of 300 islands (24) after different countries and patterned to look like the world map. Each island is for sale to rich individuals or resort builders (25) millions of dollars. The beauties of the islands are sold (26) different prices. Now, the waters that were once (27) clear are now cloudy with sand stirred up from the construction. The sand, once home to sea creatures, are used to make islands. And the beautiful coral reefs surrounding the islands are starting to clog with sand and slowly (28).

The area will never be the same, but eventually the disruption will gradually stop as the sand settles. The natural ecosystem may begin to rebuild itself and the sea life will (29) to the new environment. However, as the earth's temperature (30) and sea level grows higher as a result of global warming, Dubai's man-made islands may be covered with water once again. In that day, the island paradise could turn out to be a nightmare.
